COMMENTS BY THE CEO

We end the second quarter of the year with mixed feelings. On the one hand, our core business has performed very well, but on the other hand, we made the difficult decision to cancel the release of Life by You, as the game would not be able to meet our expectations.

Looking at the quarter's results, we've released several strong expansions with good quality to our core games, which has a positive impact on the top line and provides a good cash flow from operating activities. The bottom line is sadly weighed down by the write-down of Life by You. It is painful but gives us a strong motivation to further improve our operations.

It is clear that we have made the wrong calls in several projects, especially outside of our core, and this must change. We have areas here where we need to improve, for example in production, quality and risk assessment. In 2021, we made major changes to how we invest in riskier projects, which means that we have not started new projects with the same combination of high risk and high costs as Life by You. We have taken steps forward in those efforts. Recently, much of our focus is on achieving the right quality and taking the right risk in all types of projects. But more needs to be done. No change for the better can be too small or too big, even if it is work that will take time.

And amid the well-deserved self-criticism, it is worth reminding ourselves that we have solid footing, because the foundation of our business is doing well. Our in-house developed core games continue to deliver good content that players have appreciated. We will continue to strive to find the balance between cadence and quality, but it is an effort that never ceases. We continue to commercially optimize our games in everything from pricing and packaging to platforms and business models, all with the aim of providing players with the best way possible to take part in our games. We're also happy that Cities: Skylines II has picked up momentum, with the latest updates bringing sweeping changes to systems and many additions that players have enjoyed. It's far too early to claim victory, but these are several steps in the right direction.

Despite great annoyance at our own mistakes, we have faith. Paradox's future is bright, but we need to roll up our sleeves and work hard to fully realize the potential.

Fredrik Wester, CEO
